I currently work as a postdoctoral researcher at the Department of Economic History in Lund University. I am a research associate of Instituto Figuerola, part of Universidad Carlos III de Madrid, where I defended my PhD thesis in June 2016.

My PhD dissertation studies the patterns and determinants of service employment concentration during the 20th century in the United States. However, in my current position, I have also taken an interest for Early Modern history after working in the long-run patterns of urbanization in Sweden and the emergence of towns. I am currently investigating the effect of early church investments on population and regional inequality and the role of the railways on diversification of towns and state capacity at different points of Swedish history. In addition, I also study the consequences of agglomeration effects in living standards during the last century in Lisbon.

My broader research interests are related to the effects of place-based policies in the evolution of regional inequality over time and space, combining long-term data and modern techniques such as Geographic Information Systems and spatial econometrics.
